Thought for the week:

*"The people who have walked in darkness have seen a great light".
Isaiah 9:2*

"The people who have walked in darkness..." It is very easy when we look at the state of the world, whether it's the war in Ukraine, the climate crisis, the real injustice that continues, in different ways, to blight the lives of people across the world, it can be easy to give into despair. "The people who have walked in darkness..." The present is imperfect in so many ways, and what can you and I do about it?

"Have seen a great light..." The very fact that we can recognise the present as imperfect shows that we can see that the world could be better and we can imagine what that better world could look like. In other words we can see the light, even in the midst of the darkness. The light is the light of faith, a trust, a belief that things can be better; This light is the light of hope, a hope that we can be part of making it better. And this light is the light is the love, through our contemplation of that love, our being inspired by that love, we can put that love into the practical action that makes the world better even if that change is incremental.

*"The arc of the moral universe is long, but it bends toward justice."
